For Kid Rock/Total Freedom

i	:	Antigone
ii	:	Mass Effects
iii	:	Lateox Dov
iv	:	Model States
v	:	At the Met

A drama, according to Freytag, is divided into five parts, or acts:

- i exposition or in medies res
- ii history or backstory (rising action)
- iii climax or crisis (turning point)
- iv delay or consideration of possible courses of action (falling action)
- v denouement

A comedy is a drama in which the protagonist is better off at the end of the story than he or she was at the beginning; a tragedy is the opposite.

—Wikipedia, “Dramatic Structure”

For Kid Rock/Total Freedom is set between October 2001-April 2003.

Selections appeared in Chain, The DC Poetry Anthology,
The Hat, Logopoeia, Poetry Daily, PoetsAgainsttheWar.org,
and The Tangent. Thank you very much to the editors.

Antigone was performed at the Small Press Traffic Literary Arts Center
by Stacy Doris and Kevin Killian, in a production directed by Kevin Killian.

Heidi Ernst and Laura Ciporen provided technical assistance.

Sandeep Prasada provided difficulty.

Drew Gardner read and commented on Model States.

“Sleep and Poetry” is for David Micah Greenberg.

At the Met is a collaboration with the author of The Minor Arcana.

This ms. edition includes some restorations and emendations,
but not intentional substantive revision.

Thank you, Katherine Lederer, for publishing this book.

ii: Mass Effects

in two sections

- Ten studies, drawn from Wikipedia, in nationalisms of the short 20th century (1914-1989)
- Mass Effects (as of 2003): Countries, Factions, Corporations, NGOs

But the length of this path has to be endured, because, for one thing, each moment is necessary; and further, each moment has to be lingered over, because each is itself a complete individual shape, and one is only viewed in absolute perspective when its determinateness is regarded as a concrete whole, or the whole is regarded as uniquely qualified by that determination.

—Hegel, Phenomenology of Spirit

Recording Over

I might bask for a moment in the departed
and what's left,
when gone for a moment, and gone for good. The quick traces left in the falling wake;
the bedded pause,
light up and fade of lexical access throws off false positives,
for when subjects "recalled" 40 percent of the critical lures that had not, in fact,
been presented, it was due to their being activated, or primed, by others related semantically, with rates of false recall at 55 percent. The genuine intrusive memories of the first group and the pseudomemories of the second
are both experienced as involuntary, vivid, and emotionally evocative. That is,
genuine memories and pseudomemories
of trauma feel the same, but one is historically accurate and the other is not.

Carried the crates into the back, under the extended eaves,
each slat let in a broad channel of air
to cool the flies gently drawn across the table, slowly spreading as if tiny air postulators
spinning in toward the moon,
a pile of moons—I mean the fruit,
fired in idealized shapes.
There are structures in the mind
beyond emotion, which is very hard to fake, beyond delight.
You are beaming beyond eros and the actual stuff,
mohair and camel hair,
that singed lamb smell, ephedrine dried,
clearing space for another dream of 4-storey houses individually altered and augmented, arranged to individual tastes that foster passionate and loving elective affinities via equitable proprietary shares exchangeable transnationally and governed by 12-member rotating boards that focus on common local interests and have the option, as now,
of DVD players at Target for $44.97.

I said I would read "Stare into the Common Joy" if I did this, and here, peering
through the poor circles of an invented scrip, $5 co-payment. Filed down to cart height,
sticking to the stamp,
bursting into code,
feeling for the lamp,
I cast aspersions toward complete kinesis,
but still lay prone to mastoid insult, salinous and sodden. The air makes clear the lost tenting space;

aestheticised passing out astonished little helps, the fairest things vanished into unclosed
smiling air, rotting bosc.
Into every vacuum seethes someone willing to make tiny, horrendous orders, the flow itself
blotted lightly,
only, when un-
coagulated, to thicken again at the first sign of movement,
as if to exhaust itself had been a posture,
an exceptional position it does not occupy,
as with the installation of the 'interim' governments.
Hamid Karzai, the interim Prime Minister of Afghanistan (which is not an American colony), with whom I have been compared physically
at work as people have tried to come to terms with a decision made for them as citizens, was a top adviser to the El Segundo, California-based UNOCAL Corporation, which had been negotiating with the Taliban to construct a natural gas pipeline from Turkmenistan
through western Afghanistan to Pakistan, where I haven't been and can't go though relatively free.

Tosses thoughts
like incarnate tennis balls,
pompeian
ash come
to life,
rushing up too much too easily.

Porters
walking tragic,
shiny buttress flies,
mirrors under buses,
papers under flies,
We trade speeches as the B61 blows by on Bedford. I stick the speakers on either side of the mic
and cover the mass with a towel,
losing the pans.

Salt Lake 2002

Toward the Chute. Phat air.

Self-imposed exigencies, a kind of false evolutionary pressure, snake down consciousness and ruins of runs that jump the banks, corralling, veering into box for a pop tart. Brain as Snoopy.

Youth, describe, say, authority. Every snowfall, it seems, expedites. The windows worked, it all worked; not “technological”—“toward liberation”: the shiny tight suits are not uniforms.

Half-obsured by the hanging blanket, filth run down the sunken plumbing, welded air passages vent involuntarily, put supervascular crude extractionist, teleo-inevitable autonomy in play.

Intense polymer bonds. Red cheeks and the superhuman arm. Fucking intense half-pipe.

Non-potable

Piping in the non-potable, cutting holes in buildings. When the tankers are scoured the residue is brownish and gritty, blasted out with steam, itself recouped under pressure from the Navy Pier Desalinization Center, designed by competition. The insides of the tankers absolutely clear when full, run on clean nukes.

I think “Monsanto” every time I take a shower and get the greasy slick Asimov imagined for the moon. I tell my screened children, images projected from analyzation, about 20 minute stints in the potable, pores like little gaping mouths. Tanker’s slick pontoon at rest perpendicular to the former Yemen. Every little cough a magnified annoyance.

Democratic Process as Feed Lot

The explosive energy within the cornfed cow not possible to contain in hypermarbling or digestive fortitude—four of five stomachs fail, even when shot up with cortisone, which reaches right to the joints, radiating, when ingested, from infixed knuckles and knees rarely brought to full extension, but the corn's energy overpowers, like the sun's by the flat Sound, burning head tops and elbows without distinction.

The Ways that Windows Fit into [Casements]

The tightness of the seal deceptive, since never absolute, yet, like antibacterial soaps, works toward assuagement, blown through the general appetite that ends in sponsored deliberation. We must recreate the complex of feeling that drove...

Take another secret tablet to take it further: four times six is twenty-four, six times eight is forty eight, Kennedy caravan is sixty three,

Eight times twelve is 1996. He is six feet five, prostrate on your table. He stuck it on his head and he cried.

Leader

You won't read it when I to write to you, nor see me except within sanctioned spaces of agreement, much as representation drowns out its patrons
in the generalized din of trying to park.

When you refused to get up and walk your dog
(the mucus ran dark) and I couldn't get the elevator
to come, "Sundance" percolated unbearably, forcing us into the stairwell and down the 17

double height flights to the sandy expanse, done up in ballfield chainlink. As she relieved herself I thought of you asleep, easily rising to piss when it suited you, the alarm tuned to KTU yet ineffectual, light.

When I later confronted you with your take-out in my navy windbreaker with blue poly fur (false ruff), you seemed embarrassed,

and I could imagine a kind of vindication
but felt...nothing. Level of hydration turns out to be a class marker, bare neck a vulnerability.

But you, your absent parents, and your drilled henchmen won't be thinking about dogs, class or race
when my bald head delivers to your motherfucking face.

Lateox Dov (Elastic Bear)

I think the money you have to spend on a thing to love is destroyed by anaphylaxis.

I couldn't see you because of the glair, differentiated.

“Friends, when it's ready,
I want that red heifer, Kampf,
brought directly to my office”;
you
be the judge, climb
a monticule
that suggests
dictionary work,
endlessly replay
the initial assent,
September 28, 2000
—a ‘catastrophe’,
especially as
the work,
which continues
to involve the sawing down
of large boulders from the Second Temple period with the help of a giant electric saw and the draining of cistern #5,
was going smoothly.

Liberalism an easily led spotted calf
coming to consciousness,
gaining all four legs,
coated, like a finger protector,
for quicker donning
with an eye
to the maternal tongue.
Unstated threats wash through the air
like unsalted nuts, unformed cursive, numerous possible unrealized consequences,
or simple expressions of systemic weakness (another word rendered as ‘struggle’), as the bear lies down in the stall, stretching its entire bulk over the defiant youth.

Deposition

You feel sorry for me because I never made aliyah (www.aliyah.org).
I watch you, a band apart, pack up and move out of Boro Park

Contract Law

If every exchange is negotiated with the presumption of bad faith, the only possible way to come away with even a piece of what you want is to propose basic terms which you have no intention of fulfilling, while feeling around for what givens on the other side can be seized and services extracted without further harm to you, though the tenets of the system be destroyed. Thus one does real business with family, from whom there is no extraction, and on whom survival often depends, so is neo-sacralized, while any outside encounter provides opportunities for real advancement on terms that can be as fresh as one's devising, with no disturbance to the interior life. This is a failure of contract law, a primary means of exclusion, and an aspect of state failure in general, along with environmental depredation, disputes over birth rates, and thousands of incalculable daily forms of threat and coercion culminating in violent death that achieves sporadic documentation.

Since the issues are pressing,
there is an undeniable journalistic element,

and since there has been plenty of straight reporting,

and internal monographization
for those whose bodies are actually involved,

the relative aestheticization,
and, mutatis mutandis,

the appropriation of these issues may be permissible.

Permission itself implies a body

There's a method for remaking relations; it is called science,
and its materialist trajectory insulates it,

relatively, from the critique of aestheticization,
though some would argue that the organization and analysis of data—the transformation of the land and the lives of people into data—is a movement similar to the synthetic appropriation of poetry, the force that is used to put something in a poem, since it does not come by itself, regardless of the excuse—

the social role played by the usual agents embodying

the terms of a metaphor at the time of its construction, but regardless taking dictation. After math, everything.

Law does not seem as objective as science.
The imagination is part of the real material conditions of one's life.

iv: Model States

What we must chiefly bear in mind, then, is that physical society in time must never for a moment cease to exist while the moral society as an idea is in the process of being formed; that for the sake of man's moral dignity his actual existence must never be jeopardized. While the craftsman has a timepiece to repair, he can let its wheels run down; but the living clockwork of the State must be repaired while it is still striking, and it is a question of changing the revolving wheel while it still revolves.

Although no one has succeeded in teleporting so much as a single sub-atomic particle, some have managed to teleport the quantum states those particles are in. These states describe the exact characteristics of a particle, so in theory a body could be reconstructed particle by particle if enough quantum states were teleported.

—The Economist (June 19, 2004)

EVERY generation has apocalyptic visions, can't imagine its continuance, as in Rivette's Paris nous appartient (1960), where the exiled American communist journalist, experimenting with Art Brut in his SRO, warns Anne of converging super-militarized oligarchical death waves.

My apartment, which you'll recall from last time, is bathed in the sounds of a Red Bull event by the river, men and women amplified, shouting and generating excitement that somehow gets shunted into product, religious techniques, walking back and forth wireless.

A small amount of movement or sound has come to signify a mouse, a rebuke to systems of control by which people might be stamped out, round like a nickel and grey, with tails trailing and eyes bulging brown.

Citizens shouted very differently among their own remnants and ruins, Roman and otherwise, on 2.15.03, in the largest mass event and first global manifestation, against war or anything else, on record, detouring totalizing yelling into group demand, stamping the little silver cans into a huge reflective shield and straining to articulate what should follow, fighting enervation with ideas and engagement, dissolved caffeine and sucrose.

The scale of the problem causes fatigue because people are built to create meaning within groups of five to 15.

Steve says there's a study that says that one can only love 200 in a life, which seems to be a parameter for processing of affiliation, a limit which not coincidentally may underlie anarchism, though my beliefs run to the bureaucratic materialism that underlies communism, so that it is at that scale, talking to friends, and with that result, a kind of communism, that I have found myself able to articulate a politics, one that proceeds from the scale of my social relations, rather than a totality.

If power, or the means for making and instantiating judgments, is changed in scale by relations that form by agreement, force, or ambient internalization, and if every articulation proposes, produces, or reifies sets of relations, then the distribution of power touches all relations, which form states.

The contradictions produced by power are shared, and their articulation, by poets and others, is a real, if unwanted, function within society, as is the modeling, in poems and other media, of other possible modes of power, as on Saturdays on Rain's tiny dance floor on N 5, where I was first brought by poets, and where the men of the neighborhood admit me to a space of mutual movement that subsumes in a manner never approached on the street, where threshold tolerance dominates if I adjust my walk.

Power, an inevitable product of relations, necessarily alters bodies, often damaging, even if invisio-neuronally, or actually destroying them, as when conceptions of what is necessary and sufficient for affiliation differ or get distorted when brought into proximity and defended and enforced.

The mechanics, the bases and practices, through which power travels and changes scale, by agreement, force, or ambient internalization, is called politics, yet politics does not address bodies as such, except as instantiations of constructs in which power collects or doesn't, categories that can have a directly physical extension, like 'food', or a purely narrative function, like 'justice'.

Narrative is a set of proposed links among artificially segmented perceptions; narration is the act of proposing such links.

For power, alterations manifest in shifting relations, which can be physical, as when augmenting or protecting bodies with gloves, cars, guns, neighborhoods, tractors, planes, lending rates, coats or computers, all of which change the scale of power; for politics, shifts occur among sets of categories and catchments, also physical, casting shadows on never-fully-discrete bodies, and standing for them, in the sense that it is to categories and catchments, or what get called subjects, rather than to bodies, that judgments are ascribed.

In film and fiction, such subjects, multi-faceted categories through which social relations, and thus power, run, are called characters, and turning people into characters is what makes non-novel readers so squeamish about fiction, since doing so, reducing people to sets of attributes, is a kind commodification, or at a least reification, one that mimics the relatively unregulated market system that spawned fiction in the 18th century and with which, necessary changes having been made, we are familiar today.

Imagining commodification to be a result of market logic gets it backwards because turning people into products is a major part of sexual selection, and it is sexual selection on which the market is based, a process regulated by mores and other constraints through which people are treated as acquirable wholes that can be broken down into particular attributes, desirable or undesirable, centered on images of fitness, with shopping being a relation in which the partner doesn't talk back or experience transference.

Characters are constructed for performances within narrow bandwidths that are very restricted when compared with the actual conditions most people face, but that are alike enough that the reduction is possible, since to resist such reductions requires more energy than to acquiesce.

Turning people into characters is an amazingly effective political tool, since characters, like some commodities, do not suffer, die, or react in real time.

Characters cannot respond to an idea that takes the form of force, such as a lash against a coach and six that carries the message 'go', so it is as characters that politics prepares people for power, even when attacking one's material extension in space and attempting to reduce one to it. Death as message or story. Let's roll.

Rabbits, who have brains and bodies, are of course extraordinary, and their fierce rabbit love, while occasionally seeming aloof or unintelligible, is in fact one of the main model states; but rather than separating species, splitting characters from people also draws materialism from humanism, replacing discrete fixed code units definable by parts with floating, dynamic points of contact for myriad forces never fully visible or possible to specify but which can, with mutual labor, sustain themselves, remain buoyant as partially self-representational constructs with material bases, reducible by violence to bodies, yet capable of producing excesses like imagination.

My belief in the absolute material bases for staging such relations, fictional or otherwise, is what forces me to think about politics, along with a desire for attachment without reduction.

Art, or situations of partially suspended disbelief, of foregrounding, of heightening or intentional flattening, of protected description and inflated proposition, is a locus, in any society at any scale, for staging relations as a kind of model.

By mutual agreements that do not differ from those of regular interactions, art proposes, rather than fully instantiates, sets of relations, raising, and attempting temporarily to appear to frame those it produces, held like eye contact.

Interactions around art, when they work, produce sensations that require high levels of processing, so they tend to happen in relatively protected spaces, never absolute or guaranteed, analogous to airport cottages at Dayton or spartan dachas outside of Reykjavík, or the space we are maintaining right now.

Deliberation requires a provisional affiliation, or involuntarily imagining the consequences of sets of terms and the relations they propose, which makes deliberation disturbing, because affiliation can never be fully provisional, which is what lies behind objections to images of violence, which is why Spielberg claims to employ them only within highly motivated meaning structures, preferring models of exchange based on art, as at the climax of Close Encounters of the Third Kind (1977), when a French disco scientist and an enormous extraplanetary craft undertake a musical rondo under the auspices of a finally indulgent U.S. military, which holds fire while a highly amplified, visually interpreted five tone sequence is put forth, and is tentatively and then forcefully taken up by the hovering vessel, which goes on to offer fantastical variations upon it at speeds that only computers and geniuses at the site can process, finally allowing a large number of MIAs to be disgorged from the hull without incident, along with a young blond boy who is the focus of the movie's driving mother love, counterpoint to Dreyfus's signature lone male sublimations, so that the three momentarily form a triangulated consummation, followed by the letdown of the anthropomorphic, infantilized aliens.

Ascribing decisions characters is an act of judgment, and such acts are what make writing political, since judgment creates relations, and ascription is a kind of writing.

Aesthetic experience, or pleasure in propositional relations, can take place independently of explicit judgment, but is itself a form of affiliation, which has in the past led to critiques of the very 'absorption' that is necessary for many of its forms. Truffaut plays the scientist.

Jauss's definition of beauty (1977), "the form in which aesthetic experience presents itself," forces one to talk about specific instances and encounters, and encodes the impossibility of fully generalizing about form.

Because forms get fetishized, they change, seeking fresh access to the energy that inheres in contradictions, so that at one point, when further shifts seemed impossible, the 'dematerialization' of the art object was attempted, meaning there was an agreement among artists and others to treat encounters, procedures, and acts of documentation as art, though it proved difficult to conserve.

Because relations are always material and judgment is always affiliation, in proposing sets of relations, any work that fails to examine the material bases on which it is itself predicated, at whatever level, risks contributing to its own misrecognition, and to its being appropriated to perpetuate myths of baseless relations and consequenceless judgment unbounded by materiality or affiliation.

The contradictions resulting from that failure were alternately dramatized and parodied in Chabrol's Les biches (1968), where Jacqueline Sassard, intentionally young, striking and self-possessed in a manner that seems somehow greater, because fully incorporating reactionary classicism, than the impending soixante-huitards, produces, when asked her name by mid-30s fag-hip socialite Stephane Audran, a contemptuous, clearly enunciated «je m'appelle 'Why'», the English word doubly empty, delighting Audran's character, who negotiates with and appropriates Why, providing access to wealth and companionship that, when discontinued, eventually lead to her own character's death.

For the formalist, affiliation is a kind of death, the death of doubt, agency, and possibility, with the exception of affiliation with method, which can be taken as a means for to critique fantasies of transcendent maximalist infinitude.

By imposing rules and proposing relations along strictly material lines, formalisms can analogize the limits imposed by resources and belief systems, tacit and explicit, and surround, alter or reorder their material instantiations, revealing their provisionally, releasing joy from obligation and projected perpetuity through a “count your shit” recursion, which ironically reveals the infinite in combination.

Formalism can thus work against a default or dominant that presents itself as eternal and inviolable, and can function as an indirect critique of entrenched sets of relations, by demonstrating parallel and even random relations as potentially equally meaningful and derived from similar limits.

Method produces an oppositional position of its own, structured play, that, when taken as a model form of exchange, can shift attachment and change relations, but that when received as a product, confines its effects to that of politico-aesthetic ‘pressure valve’, or means of discharging the energy produced by contradictions so that they might remain in place.

Just as science proceeds, theoretically, out of passionate materialist disinterest, but is, in actual practice, is almost wholly market-driven, maintaining contradictions is a business that produces its own class.

I contribute to and identify with that class, partly out a desire to master shifting social codes as a means of non-familial power, being beyond the house with the attorneys who control the language of exchange, the academics who undergird it, the journalists who naturalize it, the novelists who fetishize it, and the satirists who ironize it—and also because I have a deep, infantile desire to feel safe.

What is often meant by 'freedom' is the possibility of the acquisition of such codes, which like other material acquisitions, become more expensive the more associated they are with power.

Artistic communities try to strip out, when truly functioning, the need to pay to enter, and provide a less directly monetized means of self-recognition and control. 'Cool' is the attempt to recapture freedom by explicitly rejecting this dynamic, but its cooptation, and the anticipation of its cooptation, drive the provisionality and disposability of the codes it itself takes up. When it approaches asymptotic zero, value is actually pitched toward takeover.

Fatigue is a defense against the perceived need for disaffiliation from power, which feels like a necessary prerequisite for putting one's body someplace in a coordinated resisting or advocating posture.

The attempt to operate 'outside' established classes, in a 'practice' of the sort articulated by Jack Spicer, produces, in me, dissonance with dominant projections of material self-preservation that takes the form of anxiety.

Artists invited me to join Friendster repeatedly, and I tried to turn the invitations to affiliation toward small actions, of the kind I'd seen in movies, of 5 or 15, working outside the non-profit industrial complex, with people I know, but everyone with whom I spoke projected a need for definitions and justifications to release them from fatigue, and I could not produce them on the phone or in a bar, or overcome my anxiety on my own.

Such projections are imbricated within the discourse of 'time', whereby one is consumed by work or attachment, and cannot imagine undertaking further action and self-representation, particularly in 'public', which implies submitting one's actions to large-scale collective judgment.

Most attempts to operate 'outside' are represented as criminal, as in Gun Crazy (1949), where the lovers gradually recognize one another's interlocking needs, skill-sets, self-presentations, and physicalities, and who then, in attempting to manifest them fully and in concert, discover them to be unsustainable at the highest levels without constant infusions of money, which triggers in them, beyond need for shelter and sustenance, feelings of rage and neglect that spill over into escalations of the types of 'jobs' they do, including killing those who seem to judge their acts, which eventually leads to an escalation in the scale of pursuit and to their being cornered, or isolated without adequate resources or means of further travel, and locked into an inarticulate choice between imprisonment or death.

An extension of subjectivity to partial intersubjectivity allows one to imagine absorbing violence in the belief that it will not arrive at a scale large enough to destroy the group. Stonewall was a riot.

The mass proposition of changes in specific sets of relations, protest, has been undermined by state agencies and corporations, aggregate characters granted rights of property and speech, who have developed practical tactics, including the unembarrassability of the state, for preventing the scale of actions from reaching a tipping point, or from being represented as having done so.

Fatigue gets overcome by 'extraordinary' events, like a war or a fraudulent election, but it does not seem to get overcome in the quotidian by people, like me, who feel secure but only provisionally so, since the Skinnerian partial reinforcement of the lack of guaranteed employment blocks the impulse toward resistance. It does this by putting beliefs about what constitutes work, artistic or otherwise, into conflict with resistance, making an affiliation with action into a disaffiliation with power.

Partially because disaffiliation is a kind of death, Fanon advocated violence as a means of catharsis and abreaction. Catharsis and abreaction are sometimes produced by the destruction of bodies, and are real material resources, even if invisio-neuronal.

Yet the trauma produced in survivors of violence, including those that inflict it, negates any momentary cathartic benefit, because the long-term consequences of violence include a tendency to replicate injury, perpetuating a 'cycle' that acquires narrative justifications as necessary.

Semezdin Mehmedinovic's Sarajevo Blues (1998) records instances of paramilitary beheadings within a non-colonial city that the perpetrators justify through citations of acts of violence from prior centuries.

Fanon's own "Colonial War and Mental Disorders" (1961) can be read as registering instances of such replication, grounded in specific acts arising from internalized conditions of domination and oppression.

Representations of violence, simulated as well as real, often take the form of entertainment, which can be a tool of control as well as a form of discursive preparation. Most killings require narrative preparing, which usually reduces to a single character-trait: "Someone who is threatening my life or that of someone I love" as most primal and most often given to actual soldiers, though video simulation and gaming also seem to suffice; "Someone who is in league with a force that is exploiting and destroying us, and that will not recognize our condition”: Maoist death; “Someone who is a barrier or threat to my expansion, and that is impeding my extracting the full possible benefit from a situation”: capitalist death; “Someone who is staining our representation of the ideal, or the all, and our ways of relating to it”: religious death.

The need for cathartic resolution can also be turned inward via self-abnegation. Most of the suicides I have imagined have been passive: addressing the back of my head, in 1991, to the parking lot window of our first floor apartment in Providence so that bullets, whose trajectory would be perhaps a 20 degree angle from the blacktop, fired by no one in particular, might pass between the burglar bars and into the cerebellum and stem, the old breathing brain, making little holes just at the top of the collar of the robe; or falling from an extremely fast-moving car and skidding slowly and painlessly, because blacking out, to a stop; or the gun fantasy of putting a black, plastic Uzi in my yellow vinyl shoulderbag and taking the 4 or 5 to Wall Street, where I walk up to the barricades around the Exchange, take out the fake gun and wave it in circles over my head, drawing a rain of extremely accurate, high-powered fire; but just now I became active, imagining exerting enough force on the tongue of my belt so that it would puncture the point just where the ribs part, making a kind of lower stoma, and pulling up for a tiny blunt evisceration.

Because I have imagined my own death though narcissistic fantasy, trying to imagine the deaths of others feels compromised by that same narcissism, as when reading the New York Times: being slowly killed by silicosis in a rural Chinese factory that cuts fake gems; disappeared and tortured to death for making a neutral remark outside of Cali that gets me onto the list of a limpieza faction; recruited as a soldier at age 10 and subsequently being decapitated in the Great Lakes region of Africa; raped and strangled in Gujarat in order to defile my religion as carried by my gendered body; shot in the face by a fearful cop in Harlem who has mistakenly invaded my home; being suddenly shot with an automatic weapon and bleeding to death while lined up at a coffee stand in Hebron; being slashed in the throat in Pakistan after being forced to proclaim my religious affiliation and that of my kin; being thrown down a well due to gender-specific resource allocation practices in any of several places, and drowning; or being killed in Kuwait by noncombat weapon discharge while mobilizing for deployment.

Yet because the surface conditions of “my life” depend of sets of relations that produce those conditions, the attempt to imagine and render them must inform any work that proceeds from it, to the point that, in imagining extreme forms of my own subjugation, I fantasize that in nuclear death the brain is fast enough to complete, before vaporization, the full-replay that some have reported, since a “good death” requires preparation, and while the duration of the flashbacks is reportedly long, the time elapsed, apparently, is not.

Fanon wrote in French, and French continues, in areas to which it was forcibly brought, to produce economic effects for anyone whom it subsumes or engages, and to retain, like any language, natural or artificial, accumulative traces, some of which, for French, specifically remain from when it was taken up, some sixty years after France took Algeria, as Bergson’s phenomenological instrument of duration, if not of time.

Time and duration depend on scale, in the sense that the sets of relations that produce them, gravitational and otherwise, are perceived as relatively stable and inviolate, though actually localized and in flux.

Time now dominates perception to the point that people take drugs to restore duration for short periods.

States, or dynamic, non-isolable arrangements of matter, succeed each other; time’s incrementality marks, and thus represents, different states.

Time assigns values to successive states, which are forced by brains into four dimensions, but which contain six tightly curled further planes, unimaginable but modelable, exerting their own pulls, manifest in telepathy heightened by regular congress between electively affinitive persons, discrete units of what Foucault and Negri call biopower, which Haraway finds an absurd and flaccid reduction, despite Scarry’s demonstrations of the very ways in which that reduction is effected daily in innumerable ways.

The more heightened such relations, the more character, in ecstasy, becomes what Hölderlin, in Hyperion (1798), calls soul, and it assumes, in the throes of congress, classical proportions, meaning that the relation affords access to further dimensions, as in grief.

To imagine all states, or to pick a state and then project or calculate its subsequent states from its trajectory, would be to travel in time, if a body be held stable.

If any one configuration could be isolated and held in stasis, it might form a ‘stop’, one very unlike those for buses, where internal fluctuations within the chassis continue during idling in the same manner as when in motion, as in Midnight Cowboy (1969), where Ratso’s death does not alter the bus’s course.

Nostalgia is the wish to reinstate collapsed relations. Fate is the coding of a determinate universe, in the sense of a course by which, given a certain configuration, energy will dissipate along the chains of consequence surrounding agency. Free will is how senses maximize access to possible relational configurations, with a pitch toward destruction if extension be unmet. There is a possible consciousness that might comprehend all possible states, and thus all time, but it is not necessary to imagine it.

Time and duration correlate to truth and fiction, both of which are required for love, a means of navigating the violence and involuntariness of attachment, as in Late Spring (1949), where a widower father (Chishū Ryū) of a beautiful young woman (Setsuko Hara), on perceiving her to be reaching an age that will make her a less desirable match, leads her to believe that he will remarry, so that she shifts her primary attachment from him to her intended. Truth is dick shots on craigslist, or the petroleum element of vegetarian duck. Ethics is a system for weighing competing goods, and for assigning a value to relations, like shame.

Narrative is a set of proposed links among artificially segmented perceptions marked by time; narration is the act of proposing such links, even if untrue, in order to saturate duration.

Dialects of English use of the subjunctive progressive to mark the unreal, constantly revised present as never fully experienced, as in Stalker (1979), where a glass of milk's movement means either that superhuman powers are acquired through catastrophe, or that one moves a body without witness in belief.

I was sitting at home in these various states when the clock suddenly went out and the fridge stopped. "In a few moments, will be clear whether this was an electromagnetic pulse or a power failure." Long durée oddly calm, and then slowly lifted the phone. It worked.

v: At the Met

A supplementary twist is provided by the very end of the movie, when Neo magically stops the bad squidlike machines attacking the humans by merely raising his hand. How was he able to accomplish this in the “desert of the real,” not within the Matrix where, of course, he can do wonders? Does this unexplained inconsistency indicate that “all there is is generated by the Matrix,” that there is no ultimate reality? Although such a postmodern temptation—the easy way out of ontological confusion—is to be rejected, there is a correct insight in this complication of the simple and straight division between the “real reality” and the Matrix-generated universe. Even if the struggle takes place in the “real reality,” the key fight is to be won in the Matrix, which is why the human rebels re-enter its virtual universe.

To put it in terms of the good old Marxist couple infrastructure/superstructure: One should take into account the irreducible duality of, on the one hand, the “objective” material socio-economic processes taking place in reality as well as, on the other hand, the politico-ideological process proper. What if the domain of politics is inherently “sterile,” a theater of shadows, but nonetheless crucial in transforming reality? So, although economy is the real site and politics a theater of shadows, the main fight is to be fought in politics and ideology.

—Slavoj Žižek, “Ideology Reloaded”

When the entourage decided on Michael Moore’s Fahrenheit 9/11, the rock star protested saying, “I don’t want to see that, it’s all propaganda.” This sparked a prolonged political debate in front of the theater where Simmons claimed that Kid Rock said, “Russell, don’t you understand, everything we got in this country, we got from fighting ... I’d rather go to the bar across the street.” He then refused to go into the theater with the others and said goodbye. A couple of hours later, Simmons returned to his parked car where a note was found on the windshield that read, “Vote Bush. Bush Rocks,” allegedly written by Kid Rock.

Douglas and I went up to the Met yesterday afternoon - April 19, 2003 - I brought a sign - Alissa met us there - I stood w/ sign on the sidewalk by steps near the central set of railings that leads to the entrance - text:

Some encounters:

Well-heeled white senior couple - he “agrees absolutely” - she’s furious, fixating on provenance of items in Japanese museums - they stay quite a while - Doug in long conversation with the guy - he, Egyptian-born Jewish - she, a Brit - married 56 years - “He was probably fighting age as Rommel crossed the Libyan border,” Doug says later.

Af-Am kid on bicycle stops to read the sign. I say it’s a response to the sackings, describe a little of what happened - nods.

::

Two young guys from India - one notes “There are more Egyptian artifacts here than anywhere except Egypt” - gets into v. long conversation with Doug, other guy not wanting to talk.

::

Elderly white guy with slight Euro accent- “That’s what happens. War is hell.”

::

Little crowds sort of form and dissipate of people reading - mostly not commenting but trying it out - talk to some, say it’s a response to the looting, which U.S. force under Geneva convention was obliged to prevent - drawing links to earlier empires’ plundering and, at v. least, enablement of the movement of such objects - objects landing here via robber-baron collectors - compromise resolution of provenances only begun in recent years - (had looked up Dendur - apparently Nasser gave it to the U.S. in 1965 - can’t imagine*)

Keep trying to focus on polit. consequences of this loss: on physical loss, on symbolic role it is likely to play, on how much it is congruent with this country’s actual history - just rolling over things in the way of doing business and getting at resources.

Careful to point out that de Montebello and others in “museum community” desperately trying to mop up (partially no doubt b/c of the remaining shaky standing of much of what they hold) - two U.S. interior ministers have resigned - need to communicate that citizenry cares about loss of life and culture even if govt determined to destroy and remove and make it look like benign neglect.

Alissa’s interviewing people and taking pictures – three museum guards seemingly on break or recon. very enthusiastic - all young males – one white, one mid east, one latino - then craggy white hipster-looking guy on bike - AQ later says he was an RTmark-er - many others.

(*Douglas later re: Dendur: “they build the aswan high damn...it was going to flood out this ancient valley filled (?) with antiquities—specifically the ‘huge legs of stone’ seen (?) & (or) reported by shelley in his poem...the reality is that the legs, unlike in the poem, are attached to the huge seated bodies of Ramsees the great....anyway, they had to move these to higher ground.

“the international community sent tons of money to pay for the movement in return for the $ and help, ‘we’ negotiated the ‘removal’ of some of the antiquities that were not going to be moved....so as the waters of the new lake nasar were licking at the base of the stones, the temple (having been hand picked by the prezident’s wifey) was dismantled & trucked away. Years later Jackie O’ was known to refer it as ‘my temple’.

“most of the above can be read on the walls of the museum when you go into the temple room itself.

“(i don’t know when the exhibit opened, but i’m pretty sure it was not on view till the 70’s)”)

Cop tells me to keep moving. I say, I’m on the sidewalk. She says, it’s the Met’s sidewalk, and they don’t condone political activity - I say, I’m just standing here, and there’s no way they own the sidewalk - she says, they do, from 81st to 88th, I’m just informing you - I think, if I move around a little for a minute or two she’s done her job, and we can do another round if necessary - I say “ok” - she drifts off - I move around a little - seems to work, though this I think though would be a problem with more people in an organized thing - and there’s no way they Met can actually have control of “their” sidewalk, is there? Were granted land as part of Central Park?

Kid Rock-looking guy - small blue eyes - long, shiny thin mouse brown hair dyed appealingly and lightly blond - rangy guy, tall - very thin - maybe 30 - little mounds and white opaque calluses on his white outstretched hand - says -

You see this hand [visibly shaking]?
This is a working man's hand.
Hands like this built this country.
Get a job.

Looks me in the eye threateningly. I'm in a bourgeois panic and have no response. I don't say: you're right: I don't have hands like that and hands like that built the country, but those who did build the country have not been given equal share, and the neglect and destruction of the work of people over centuries in Iraq/Mesopot. is just like the govt's neglect and destruction of working people here. He stalks off with girlfriend. Need to learn from this.

(I do think though this is the way to draw the link plunder of the U.S. labor and natural resources similar to artifact plunder or its enablement - need to be able to articulate this simply.)

Hilarious touch - as we're walking a little about 10 minutes later, pass him going in the other direction - our eyes catch, and he immediately gives me a sign - his hand makes an "L"-like shape, and he bangs it into his forehead repeatedly - I'm completely freaked out and scared that it's some Nazi thing - Doug laughs and tells me it's "Loser"...

Two young white British women and their silent white male companion - middle class but Yoof affected - plus a white old-school UFT guy who has glommed onto us and been yelling at people - challenges one of the women as to why she's for the war - she says "I have my reasons" and the guy says - "What are they??" - and she just looks at him - and he repeats it, with maniacal glee - and she says, "I can't listen to this" - and turns quickly with other woman in tow - sentry looks at us sympathetically - and follows.

An Af-Am guy w/ close cropped hair and wraparounds late 20s early 30s - w/ two friends - he stops to talk and they keep going - specifics of the library and museum sackings - some back and forth over how it could have been prevented - I get to that I didn't know what else to do except make this sign - as he's leaving: "I'm with you, you keep doing your thing."

Doug meanwhile in long, friendly but pointed exchange with white male Gulf War vet now TV news cameraman over whether the troops could have prevented plunder - chipping away at his story - but the yelling guy keeps interrupting, escalating.

Seems like debate, but Doug says not really:

"i know why i get angry when rich people go on and on about tax cuts, but what makes the pro war people so angry about people who are against it?

"it's like being mad at a fan of the losing team in a sporting event...oh, those people are angry too? i never figured out what made the winning fans so angry & mean either.

"probably not the same thing though.

"the WAR people don't act like winners, they act like you are really threatening them..."

"At the Intersection
stopping traffic, small action in iowa city, two weeks ago:
me holding a sign that says 'us out of iraq'
big m.f. SUV, driver 40-ish white male. he shouts
'bitch' and clips me where i stand, knocking the sign out of my hands. with his big ass m.f. SUV.
i mean really.
& that's what it looks like here."

Realizing standing there that “Who Stole...” is a page right out of Baraka -

Ok - but wld. he see as another theft - later recall Steve Burt remarking (remarking ironically, since was re: deep image or something) that when members get proprietary over techniques, literary movements fall apart - but yet, materialist analysis in a way yields allusions and (even unconscious) steals as stolen labor - art and market capital share this quality - the knock-off - the sellable parody - the incorporation - who gets to go home after this?

the sign as pressure valve

Sun setting behind museum - different little groups catching last warm patches - lots of eyes on the sign but no one wants to talk - lots of fatigue.

White woman mid-40s - middle class brown hair loose shortish and a little frizzy - thick but not overdone lipstick - looking intently, looks up slow - “The whole time we were in there I was thinking: what if we came in here and stole everything? How would people here feel about that?” Pause. “We should do it.” Eyes far off imagining it.
